

His former hut being now become a pleasant arbour, he now consults to make it as commodious as beautiful. Here is, said he, a delightful dwelling, warm in winter, and cool in summer; pleasant to the eye, and comfortable to the body; pity it should be employed to any use but repose and delight! so resolved upon making a kitchen near it. Thus having fixed upon a place at the side of his lodge, twelve feet in length, and eight in breadth, which he inclosed with the turfs that covered the outside of his arbour, before it was thick enough of itself to keep out the cold; then having laid sticks across the top of the walls, which were about eight feet high, he lays turf thereon, leaving an open place for the smoke to go out at.

The outside being done, he goes about inside necessities, as fire places to roast and boil at; thus he cuts a hole in the ground, at a small distance from the wall, after the manner of stew stoves in noblemens kitchens; then at another place he sets two flat stones, about eight or nine inches broad, and one foot long, edge ways, opposite to one another, near two feet asunder, then puts a third in the same manner, at the end of the other two; so made a fire-place fit to roast at: then for other conveniences, he weaves twigs about about sticks, stuck in the wall on of the kitchen, where he lays the for utensils, which both adorned and it.

Having finished that piece of work and visits his plantations, which he in thriving condition, the roots being of the size of a pea to that of an egg.

Having resolved, as the summer ed, to thin his cloathing by degrees, to ripping his jacket, in the lining he finds seven peas and three beans were got in at a hole in the corner pocket.

Those few made him wish for more, thinks they may, by time and industry improved to a quantity large enough him for a meal; then lays them up for proper time to set them.

One day as he was walking in a fish-pond, a large fowl flew out, in its bill, being too big for it. This discovered the cause why the birds did not encrease, they being devoted to a bird; which to prevent for the future studies means to kill the destroyers, being proper instruments. A boy only thing he could apply to, he did one forthwith. Thus, having picked
